Article Spotlight | JHTE

Are hospitality traits innate, or can they be developed through education?

This JHTE study explores the role of tertiary education in shaping genuine hospitality, examining how Big Five personality traits influence hospitableness among service industry workers. Findings reveal that traits such as agreeableness and neuroticism play a role, while hospitality education acts as a key moderator, shaping how these traits translate into real-world hospitable behavior. A valuable contribution for educators and industry professionals seeking to better understand and develop authentic hospitality. Read the full article: doi.org/10.1080/10963758.2025.2575692

Remembering Dr. Mathwich

A Life of Service to Hospitality Education

The WestCHRIE community mourns the passing of Britt Mathwich, Associate Professor of Business and Hospitality Management at Colorado Mesa University (CMU).

Britt brought more than 40 years of hospitality industry experience to his teaching, with expertise in destination resort management and development. At CMU, he began teaching in 2011 and was known for connecting theory with real-world hospitality practice through industry examples, guest speakers, internships, and experiential learning. He also helped form and advise the CMU Hospitality Management Club and contributed to the development of the Hospitality Management Advisory Board. His work included research and presentations on hospitality internships, competitive benchmarking, ethics education, and the development and operation of Hotel Maverick, CMU's on-campus teaching hotel.
